Polypoid breast cancer in premenopausal women: a pathological study of patients from a single center. Breast cancer in premenopausal women differs from the classical form of breast cancer in terms of biology, prognosis, and response to therapy. Over a 6-year period, our institute observed 22 patients with polypoid breast cancer (PC). Pathological and clinical features were examined retrospectively. Clinical information was obtained from medical records. Tumors were graded and staged according to the UICC. The follow-up was conducted in the outpatient clinic. The median age of the patients at diagnosis was 31 years (range: 18-45 years). Seventeen patients were diagnosed with invasive ductal carcinoma and the remaining patients with invasive lobular carcinoma. A total of 15 tumors (68.2%) were Grade 2. Sixty percent of PC was moderately or poorly differentiated. The median tumor size was 2 cm. Estrogen and progesterone receptor positivity was observed in 50% and 37.5%, respectively. Lymph node involvement was observed in 45% of patients. In addition, 16.6% and 9.1% of patients presented with lymphatic and vascular invasion, respectively. The overall survival was 79.1%, and disease-free survival was 72.7%. Three patients presented with distant metastasis. Our results indicate that breast PC is a distinct histological variant of breast cancer that often arises in young women and is
